Jessie Bell's last parole hearing was a disgrace--one board member called her a witch and a harpy and that given the chance, he would have her put down like a rabid dog.

Ten years in prison for killing her sadistically abusive husband had turned Jessie Bell into a poisoned, embittered, and dangerous person. The parole hearing was the straw that broke the camel's back. It was payback time.

An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth? No, not for Jessie Bell. Her version of justice wasn't just about getting even. It was about taking back twice as much as had been taken from you. Two eyes for one. Justice meant redressing all the imbalances--and putting out only one eye didn't compare to the loss of all the advantages of losing two eyes.

Jessie is offered the position of the late Pavo, Regan's Uncle Paul, in the Organization and she accepts it.

"Justice," she murmured. "Poetic justice. Justice that I can create myself."

She balled up her fists on the table. "Yeah, there's more than a few people who I know who need some poetic justice right about now."

There is only one person who could possibly stop the inevitable bloodbath that Jessie is about to unleash on the city--Judge Regan St. Clair--but to do so she must cross the line she has sworn never to cross--join the Organization.

But maybe it is as Uncle Paul always said: "The end justifies the means."
